There is no substitute for sound design when it comes to implementing a plan to reward salespeople for meeting or exceeding objectives (Chonko, Enis and Tanner 1992). Numerous generic approaches have been offered for designing a compensation and incentive plan (c.f. Churchill, Ford and Walker 1990). Designing the right reward plan means choosing the best package as dictated by individual , sales, marketing, and organization objectives . Sales management should not gear the plan only toward its particular needs. Most organizations utilize a blend of salary, commission, bonus, incentive and recognition programs that focus on profitable sales performance. The key is to position reward combinations to fit...

ABSTRACT: One way real estate management firms can boost employee motivation is by developing incentive compensation programs which reward individuals for meeting specified goals. Incentive programs have a number of benefits, including: helping to articulate corporate priorities; improving communication; and improving employee loyalty. Important considerations when establishing incentive program includes: making sure rewards are timely; making sure reward procedures are objective; and making sure programs are easy to administer. The most successful reward programs are those that are well planned and are established with long-term commitment from management.

ABSTRACT:

...sales and marketing executives of Fortune 1000 companies found that 91% of such firms employ incentive programs to attain company objectives. These individuals indicate that incentive programs are used by their company to motivate consumers, employees, dealers, and distributors. Ninety-seven percent of the executives value incentive programs, while more than half prefer product awards because these provide lasting memories of an achievement. Among the companies surveyed, more than half employ incentive programs for different groups: 30% use them for employees, 23% utilize them in employee and consumer...

...the products used as award. Almost one-fourth (24%) of the respondents say they conduct incentive programs on a yearly basis, 15% provide quarterly programs, another 15% implement seasonal campaigns, while 12% conduct monthly programs. Article includes a pie graph depicting the proportion of respondents using incentive programs.
